

UNSEEN SCAR OF THE MIND

Since elementary school, I've often seen people around me picking their fingers, and I do the same. I start subconsciously picking my hands when I'm nervous, and by the time I realize it, I've already drawn blood. In the eyes of my parents, this is a niche bad habit, and whenever they see it, they choose to educate us with punishment to make us stop this behavior. But to this day, I still find myself picking my fingers subconsciously when I'm tense or anxious. This might be the source of the shame people feel towards BFRB (Body-Focused Repetitive Behavior) symptoms. However, many negative emotions such as stress and anxiety can exacerbate, and picking fingers, scratching the scalp, and pulling out hair are a kind of subconscious self-protection mechanism.
